Orwell, “It was a bright cold day in December, 1949, in New York City. The winter had come on suddenly, and the snow was deep. It was a particularly cold winter, and everyone was poor. The room was empty except for one man, who sat by the fireplace and inhaled the cold air. He was the old man who had once been a prophet and who now was just a shadow of his former self. He was wearing a thick overcoat and seemed to be in his seventies. His face was gaunt and his eyes were hollow. He spoke in a low, raspy voice, as if he were half-asleep. “It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was an age of adoration, it was an age of Contempt, it was the season of Righteousness, it was the season of Perfidy, it was the spring ofTradition, it was the winter of Our contentment, it was the year’s changeful season; it was commerce, it was politics, it was the church, it was the state. It was the age of the world’s première, it was the age of its last.”

In the room, a dog was lying on the floor, its breath visible in the cold air. The dog was a large, black and white mongrel, and it seemed to be sleeping. It moved slightly as if it were aware of the man’s presence, but otherwise remained motionless. The man looked at the dog, then turned his gaze back to the fire. He said, “I am a man of two minds. I have seen both good and evil, and I have chosen to live my life with both of them.”

The man closed his eyes and fell into a deep slumber, his breath still visible in the air. The dog remained motionless, its breath still visible as it watched over the man’s dreams. The room was silent, except for the crackling of the fire and the faint sound of the dog’s breathing. It was a moment of peace, a moment of stillness, and it lasted for what seemed like an eternity.
